SHARING TIME & TALENT

AutoTrader.com IT Project Manager Sam Morrison had moved data centers before, so when TechBridge needed to migrate its servers to a new donated space, he knew what to do. First, he consulted with the internal team and pulled in a data center expert. Then he created a detailed plan, coordinated resources and executed the move, a 60-hour commitment on his part. "At work, it's a little harder to see the benefits of what you do, what value it adds and impact it has," Sam says. "TechBridge helps other nonprofits use technology to help communities, so when we help them, we're impacting many more efforts."

The Finance and Facilities team was looking for a good project for a big team to do, and providing picnic tables for The Bridge turned out to be a perfect fit. Dave Spotts, director of facilities, knew where to buy inexpensive, well-built kits and had them delivered to The Bridge campus. He demonstrated how to assemble the tables, and then 50 or so volunteers split into teams and began to build. Dave checked in periodically to make sure all went well. "We had lots of handy people, and some who had never held a hammer in their hand," he says. "The tables all turned out great, and the kids and staff loved them."

Jim Sullivan, senior manager of talent acquisition, and his team wanted to support a local nonprofit but didn't have the budget for financial contribution. Instead, they held classes to help job-seeking parents at the Atlanta Children's Shelter, which provides free day care, education for homeless children and family services. They also held resume critiques and mock interviews for job seekers through the Latin American Association. "As a team, we
